

YOU ARE 24 CARROT GOLD : WORDS OF LOVE FOR SOMEONE WHOS WORTH THEIR WEIGHT IN ROOT VEGETABLES PDF, EPUB, EBOOK

none | 96 pages | 02 May 2019 | Octopus Publishing Group | 9780753733622 | English | London, United Kingdom

Silphium - Wikipedia

Whatever the case, please let us know, and help us improve this Punpedia entry. Got a new pun that isn't in this Punpedia entry? Submit it below and if it's terrible enough, our curators will add it to the entry! Just lettuce have a good day! Turn up the beet! All the movies I just watched were rad-ish. Just leave me alone, okay? What do you call an animation done by a potato animator? A cardoon. Skip to content. Punpedia The Online Encyclopedia of Puns.

Vegetable Puns List Each item in this list describes a pun, or a set of veggie puns which can be made by applying a rule. The celery was too low. More herbs? What has changed is that the pandemic has sounded a clarion call for urgent action. The Update will feature leading scholars and practitioners discussing the ways Indonesia and Indonesians have encountered, navigated, and overcome the challenges of achieving longer and better quality of life. Information and registration details can be found here. Cruise ships became an unhappy herald of global distress in the first weeks of the pandemic. The virus leapt from deck to deck in the close quarters of these huge floating palaces. Ship owners scrambled. Where once cheerful and cashed-up tourists had been welcomed by their thousands, vessels were abruptly barred from port. Only the challenge compounded. Stranded passengers had to be returned home. For the cruise industry, exposed a business model that had sailed to riches on the currents of modern globalisation.

In cruising attracted nearly 30 million passengers. Yet estimates since the resumption of cruising in late report only , passengers have braved the decks. Many vessel owners found themselves orphaned as the pandemic struck. With ships registered under flags of convenience and companies incorporated in countries such as Liberia or Panama, crewed by multinational labour, fearful governments only felt obliged to the fate of their own citizens. The companies, with their millions of dollars in capital investments, could fend for themselves, leaving a hazy horizon into which the cruise industry sails. But the CLIA estimates that by September , around 57 per cent of the industry will be back in operation, rising to 77 per cent by the end of December. With new rules in place on passenger numbers, social distancing and public health measures, as well as inevitable outbreaks , the numbers will take time to recover.

Still, the optimism is nonetheless striking. And massive investments already made are a powerful incentive to salvage the industry. In , the maritime industry was supposed to see the ramping up of clean shipping — which included a shift from the nearly three per cent of global carbon emissions that shipping currently produces, to a 40 per cent reduction on carbon intensity levels by The ambition will be tempered. Most vessels would have been ordered well before any fears of a global health crisis emerged. They were designed for pre-pandemic conditions. With the Covid outbreak and subsequent decline in passenger numbers that would ordinarily absorb the heavy investments by cruise lines, the ship operators will inevitably have to carry the costs or increase ticket prices, reducing the industry from a mass market tourist attraction to more of a niche player. To give a sense of the shuddering cost, in cruising attracted nearly 30 million passengers.

Yet CLIA estimates that since the resumption of cruising in late , only , passengers have braved the decks, mostly from the United States, Singapore, the Caribbean and Europe — regions that traditionally have had the most enthusiastic cruise customers. And not everyone is happy to see the cruise liners haul into view. In Barcelona, for example, a city long troubled by concern over tourist traps, local protests greeted the lifting of a ban on cruisers in June that had been in place since coronavirus struck. Similar protests took place in Venice. Adding to the extra costs will be the price of operating on greener fuels as the maritime industry as a whole makes the transition to zero carbon and carbon neutral energy by US economic research indicates that Americans were spending up to 42 per cent of their stimulus cheques.

Nevertheless, even the flush US consumer may not be able to save the cruise industry from the aggressive new regulations that are expected to be implemented in Europe, which in turn will add pressure on the global maritime regulator, the International Maritime Organisation IMO , to follow suit. A growing and vociferous environmental lobby has focused on the effects of cruising on the marine environment.

In the latest raft of regulations from the IMO, existing vessels will need to meet new rules on operational emissions, with the carbon intensity of international shipping to be reduced by 40 per cent in the next decade. These measures are due to be enforced from Effectively, tomorrow in shipping terms. However, the IMO has come under fire for its lack of ambition, not least from some of the early movers looking to shift to greener fuels, who fear they will be at a competitive disadvantage. Moreover, the European Union has included the maritime sector in its Emissions Trading Scheme for the first time and the expectation is that this will be enforced from , adding yet more costs for operators. A criticism aimed at both the IMO and EU regulators is that the new rules will allow the shipping industry to continue to pollute through a lack of controls over the use of liquefied natural gas LNG.

According to CLIA, some 51 per cent of cruise ships currently on order will be fuelled by LNG, which is considered less polluting than diesel as it produces fewer particulates and sulphur and nitrous oxide emissions. However, environmental organisations have expressed alarm that methane, which can be a residual element of the exhaust gases, as well as methane leakage in the mining and transportation processes, could see rising levels of methane deposited into the atmosphere. And methane is around 80 times more potent as a greenhouse gas than carbon dioxide, although it remains in the atmosphere for less time.

Armed with this knowledge and the growing pressure on the maritime industry — and the cruise industry in particular — most observers expect further, more stringent, measures to be applied to the shipping industry in the next few years, with regulators targeting LNG as a fuel well before the end of this decade. In addition, there is a growing and vociferous environmental lobby that has focused on the effects of cruising on the marine environment — from problems caused by invasive species carried in the ballast water tanks of larger ships, to the detrimental effects of large-diameter propellers on local ecosystems. A recent example includes the alleged damage to the coral reef around the Mexican island of Cozumel. The cruise industry has altered dramatically since early , and the changes so far are only the early moves in a protracted transition.

Expectations of consolidation in an industry where there are few players are not far-fetched. Reduced demand and substantially inflated prices will play into this scenario. The question for cruise companies is how much of a burden the transition to climate-friendly fuels will be. If shipping is to make the transition to greener technology, that too may limit employment opportunities, with a decrease in demand for new vessels impacting cruise ship building, which is centred mainly in European yards, in Finland, Italy and France, with smaller vessels built in Norway.

It is the acute and urgent changes to the economic ecosystem of the cruise business that will mean, by , cruising will be unrecognisable from the industry that set sail at the start of the decade. Now, it offers visitors something much more novel: a quarantine free holiday. As of the start of July, fully vaccinated visitors from select countries can fly directly into Phuket and go straight from the tarmac to the beach. Fears over the safety of Phuket communities, as well as cynical assumptions that few would take up the confusing and expensive offer, blighted the program in its first weeks. Still, if it goes well, expect to see other holiday favourites such as Koh Samui, Koh Phangan and Koh Tao accessible shortly afterward. Thailand was the first country outside of China to record a case of Covid which saw tourism grind to a halt in the first couple of months of Thailand was the first country outside of China to record a case of Covid which, paired with mass cancellations of trips from Chinese visitors, saw tourism grind to a halt in the first couple of months of The sharp, sudden decline in visitor numbers and then eventual rolling lockdowns smashed the country, where tourism accounts for around 12 per cent of GDP.

The delicate balance between economic imperative and public health has been revealing of governments around the world. In Thailand, that balance has looked desperate as the government moved to open something — anything, anywhere — to tourism. Phuket is a natural choice. And as one of the most visitor-dependent provinces in a country already vulnerable to the whims of tourism, it is among the most desperate. The tourism industry has been all but destroyed by a year of no visitors, but public health is also paramount. The government in Bangkok promised the plan would not go ahead until the community reached 70 per cent vaccination by the 1 July launch, which did in the end fall short — but only slightly.

The province has been plagued by the same issues as the mainland in terms of securing vaccine stock and navigating complicated online systems. Still, the vaccination program will continue alongside the opening of the sandbox. At least six tourists have tested positive for Covid after arriving on the island under the sandbox program. One of the first to be identified was a visitor from United Arab Emirates who had taken the test as part of requirements upon arrival. Drivers and hotel staff who had come into contact with the man were placed into self-isolation. Health officials confirmed the tourist was vaccinated fully with the Sinopharm vaccine.

His blunt words refer to the growing disaster on the mainland, with new daily record deaths as the Delta variant surges through the country. Fresh restrictions are expected imminently including restrictions on interprovincial travel — essentially ending the quasi-quarantine of Phuket before heading elsewhere. Ironically, the launch of the Phuket sandbox may have become a spreader event for the political elite in Bangkok who attended.

Prime Minister Prayuth Chan-o-cha, who proudly attended the launch on the island, went into self-isolation after an attendee tested positive. He may well use that time spruiking the sandbox idea to other leaders in the region. As planned travel bubbles, such as that between Singapore and Australia, collapse under the weight of new cases and unsteady vaccine programs, the sandbox could become an option for other tourist-friendly countries in Southeast Asia. That may be overly ambitious for the time being, but it shows an industry pivoting towards creative ideas which acknowledge the pandemic is a long way from being over. By the end of the year Phuket expects to have played host to , visitors. A long cry from the 10 million in years past but a respectable start for a devastated community fighting its way back.

A worsening third wave of Covid is a cruel new blow in Myanmar, still reeling from the human costs of the coup on 1 February, and with a military junta more focused on combatting dissent than combatting the virus. Thousands of new cases have arisen since late May, and the Delta, Alpha and Kappa variants have been detected. From 1 to 11 July, the junta-run health ministry reported almost 35, cases nationally and over deaths.

In Kalay, a town in northwest Myanmar where locals have fiercely resisted army rule, aid workers and residents have estimated hundreds of Covid-related deaths and pictures on social media show people queuing to replenish scarce oxygen supplies. One local resident told Radio Free Asia that a local crematorium was overwhelmed and people were having to fend for themselves. People in Kalay queue to fill their oxygen cylinders on July 7. Photo: Yin Suu Pusue. The Myanmar junta has progressively announced a patchwork of restrictions, including stay-at-home orders for a number of townships in the commercial center of Yangon, the capital Naypyidaw, and across at least six other states and regions.

On 8 July, schools were ordered to close across the country for two weeks to stem infections. With the overlapping crises of the coup and Covid, United Nations agencies estimate that over 6 million people in Myanmar are in urgent need of food aid. In mid-June, she was arrested in downtown Yangon along with her husband and seven-year-old son for her involvement in the nationwide civil disobedience movement.

The military crackdown itself has left almost people dead, more than 5, detained, and some , people internally displaced. Parts of the country, in both urban and rural towns, have seen armed resistance; decades-old conflicts continue in ethnic nationality areas; and a collapsing economy is pushing more people into poverty. Any country would struggle to contain the current Covid outbreak, but in post-coup Myanmar the challenges appear particularly acute. Some medics have resorted to providing care in secret. At least attacks on healthcare facilities, personnel, ambulances and patients have been recorded since the coup. Twelve healthcare workers have been killed, hospitals taken over, and more than medical personnel arrested, according to Insecurity Insight, an organisation specialising in risk assessments.

Myanmar had secured an initial batch of vaccine from India prior to the coup, some of which were then reportedly appropriated by the military. But supplies from India dried up as that country focused on its own severe outbreak. China has since donated , doses and the junta recently revealed it is negotiating with Russia to purchase a supply of the Sputnik vaccine. As has invariably been the case under decades of military rule, Myanmar citizens are being left to draw on their own strength and resources. More than a year into the Covid pandemic, how much outside financial support is the Pacific receiving and how far does this go in helping the region weather the crisis? This time last year in The Interpreter we took stock of the provision of Covid related external financial assistance to the Pacific.

Additional support was also available from the International Monetary Fund via its expanded rapid financing windows. But only Samoa and Solomon Islands had been able to access this at the time. After avoiding the worst for many months, Covid outbreaks are now underway in a number of Pacific countries. So where do things stand in terms of the provision of international financial assistance?

Curiously, however, there has been limited uptake of the expanded IMF rapid financing windows despite their large potential scale. SDRs come with no conditionality and can be readily exchanged for hard currency. Calls for a new SDR allocation have been made since the start of the pandemic but were blocked by the Trump administration, a position the Biden administration has now reversed. The new SDR allocation is expected to be completed by late August. The Pacific might also benefit substantially further depending on what happens with plans for richer countries to channel their own new SDRs to poorer and more vulnerable countries that need them more.

Overall, the scale of external financial assistance to the Pacific now looks very sizeable, as shown on the chart below. And, unlike at the time of our previous stocktake, the majority of this constitutes new money in response to the pandemic, rather than reprioritised or frontloaded financing that the Pacific was going to get anyway before Covid struck. There is, however, a lot of important variation across countries. The scale of support is very large in many of the smaller Pacific economies but relatively low in PNG, the largest country in the Pacific by a wide margin.

Crucially, this additional financing needed to be above and beyond that which the Pacific had either already received or was otherwise expected to receive in our baseline scenario. There is also the potential that sizeable additional amounts might be made available if richer countries follow through on plans to channel their own new SDRs to poorer countries. After having avoided the worst of the virus for so long, widespread vaccination is critical, but progress is mixed and most countries in the region are struggling.

Vaccine supply and access now seem much more uncertain and difficult than what we assumed last year. The bottom line? A lot of financial help is flowing to the Pacific and more is on its way. The scale up in international support to the region has so far been substantial. But there is no question vastly more is needed. Thailand emerged from the first year of the Covid pandemic as one of the best performing countries in the world in terms of minimising cases and deaths.

But has been a different story. A surge in infections since the beginning of April has seen thousands of new cases each day and a spike in deaths. More than 17, people in prison have contracted Covid in this third wave in Thailand, and the tally is rising daily. On 25 May, the Thai health ministry reported new cases in prisons in the preceding 24 hours alongside more than new cases among the general population. Prisons across greater Bangkok have been hit particularly hard, but cases have also been reported at prisons in Narathiwat in the south and Chiang Mai in the north. It takes little imagination to comprehend the heightened health risks faced by people detained amid a global pandemic. Unsafe and unsanitary conditions, poor ventilation, overcrowding and limited access to health services are issues in prisons around the world, and the physical and mental health of people in prisons is typically well below those living on the outside. Infections may be spread within and between prisons through new admissions, prisoner transfers, visits and staff deployments across multiple prisons, affecting people in prison, staff and the community.

In the United States alone, as of 18 May, just under , people in prison had tested positive, with an estimated deaths, according to The Marshall Project, a not-for-profit group focused on reporting on the US criminal justice system. The figures are even higher when accounting for people across all detention settings, as tracked by the New York Times. In Thailand, which has consistently had one of the highest incarceration rates in the world, the risk of an outbreak was always high. At one facility, the Thailand Institute of Justice recently reported that 35—45 people were forced to share a single cell, sleeping shoulder to shoulder. After being slow to act, Thai authorities are now scrambling to respond. Measures flagged to address the outbreak across multiple prisons include the ramping up of testing and vaccinations for people detained, an increase to the quarantine period for new prisoners to 21 days, a halt to prison transfers and consideration given to the early release of 50, people.

Prison authorities were also instructed to establish field hospitals to treat patients. However, few officials are sounding optimistic. Prisons are not the only sites that have seen major outbreaks during this third wave. More than cases were detected at a single factory in Phetchaburi, south-west of Bangkok, more than half of whom are migrant workers from Myanmar.

An estimated 1. Prime Minister and former coup leader Prayuth Chan-ocha is one of the lucky ones — earlier this week, he posed for the cameras with his vaccination certificate after receiving his second dose of the AstraZeneca vaccine. Admittedly there were a few baked hippies, but the cooking was good. Fiji has taken an almighty hit. Foreign tourists have vanished, all non-essential businesses have been forced to close, and the much mooted Pacific travel bubble is likely to be off the cards for the immediate future.

With national debt levels soaring , a nasty storm is brewing. Fiji needs to diversify its economy away from a reliance on tourism. Many people complained that calls to the food-ration hotline went unanswered, or the deliveries never arrived, while the need for Fijians to provide tax details in order to claim the relief payments meant those in the informal sector were all but left behind. A cannabis industry in Fiji would not be limited to growing the crop.

A whole value-add supply chain could be created. But of course the leaf is grown. One of my favourite news pieces from was about villagers shooting down police drones with spear guns to hide their marijuana plantations on Kadavu, an island south of Suva. Rebooting the agricultural sector is an area the Fijian government has identified as one which could be strengthened. Fiji has a solid history of agricultural exports. More recently, yaqona kava has been targeted as a growth opportunity in the sector, due to its widespread use in the region for relaxation and stress relief. Unfortunately, yaqona takes several years before it can be harvested. Like other agricultural products, it is also exposed to heightened risks of environmental damage, for example cyclones.

As the name suggests, cannabis is a resilient crop and capable of harvesting after three months. Just look at Fiji Water. The idea of a marijuana industry in Fiji is not new. The idea was debated most recently in March at a Nadi Chamber of Commerce roundtable. The government was adamant in response it has no plans to legalise marijuana. Fiji could do what other countries have done, legalising marijuana for medicinal and hemp fibre production, while banning recreational use.

Such a move would follow similar regulation in countries including Malawi , Lesotho and Uganda , as well as Thailand in Southeast Asia, among others. A permit system could be created for growing marijuana on designated islands in Fiji. This could all be carried out in Fiji and create jobs for Fijians. There will be concern about any partial legalisation leading to greater recreational use of cannabis among the local population. Those partial to the saba are still likely to partake, whether it is legal or not. These are the types of risks the government should be able to manage with responsible regulation and enforcement. Research and a feasibility study should be first undertaken to determine the viability and opportunity that a cannabis industry could present. From there, a better judgement can be made about what would be required to regulate it. And just maybe the volatility of the pandemic could be the catalyst for Fiji to innovatively diversify the economy and generate a new export market to its advantage.

The failure of the Australian government to return citizens and permanent residents from New Delhi on the first repatriation flight to Darwin since the recent shutdown of air travel from India amounts to an Australian policy failure and a breach of international law. A travel ban on direct flights from India was imposed on 27 April in response to the rising number of Covid cases. Those orders expired on 15 May; however, all passengers boarding the now-resumed Qantas repatriation flights coordinated by the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade must have secured two Covid-negative tests days prior to departure. This resulted in 70 passengers, made up of 46 who returned Covid-positive tests and 24 close contacts, being denied seats on the first flight.

That plane landed in Darwin with only 80 of an anticipated passengers on board, notwithstanding that the initial set of resumed repatriation flights were for the most vulnerable Australians in India. Two more DFAT-coordinated flights are scheduled for May and, given the ongoing high incidence of Covid in India, it must be anticipated that similar circumstances will arise and Australians will be denied a right to board. Australians in India are not awaiting their repatriation flights in controlled quarantine-style hotels and remain susceptible to community transmission. Alternate commercial air routes to Australia via transit countries are very limited at present, due to other countries also suspending flights from India. The effect of these policies and laws is that many Australians are trapped in India awaiting the next DFAT-coordinated flight.

On the basis that more than 80 Australians are reported to be in India seeking repatriation, under current legal, policy and operational settings, it will take many months for them to arrive in Australia. Over the years, Australia has developed a reputation of coming to the aid of citizens in peril as a result of terrorist attacks, natural disaster, civil strife or armed conflict. In , there was a medical evacuation of 70 Australians from Indonesia to Darwin following the terror attacks in Bali. More than 80 Australians and other foreign nationals were also evacuated by the Australian government in as conflict engulfed Lebanon. Likewise, Australians have been evacuated by the Australian Defence Force from regional trouble spots including Fiji and Solomon Islands. DFAT has been keen to stress, however, that there are limits to such operations, as occurred when Australians were caught up in unrest in during the so-called Arab uprisings.

Australian governments have previously demonstrated a capacity to repatriate citizens in times of emergency and medevac the critically ill. On 10 May this year legal proceedings challenging the Indian travel ban were dismissed by the Federal Court of Australia on the basis that Health Minister Greg Hunt had power under the Biosecurity Act to issue the 1 May orders. Constitutional legal arguments that there is a right of citizens to enter Australia were ultimately not heard. International law is clearer on the right of citizen entry. This argument would be countered in view of the quarantine controls placed on all persons who enter Australia. The Convention on the Rights of the Child also creates obligations towards Australian children in India.

This raises for consideration whether the rights of accompanied and unaccompanied Australian children in India denied entry to Australia have been taken into account. The operative effect of the Biosecurity Act orders, and now the conditions of carriage on Australians boarding Indian repatriation flights, is that citizens are being left behind. All the evidence suggests some will continue to be stranded in India for many months. In , DFAT undertook the herculean task of coordinating the repatriation of Australians from all parts of the globe. The outcomes were remarkable. DFAT supported the return of 26, Australians to 30 June on flights from 90 countries, including 63 non-scheduled commercial flights. The time has come for a shift in thinking with respect to Australians in India. The United States has thrown its support behind demands from developing countries to temporarily waive intellectual property IP rights for Covid vaccines.

Other rich countries, including Australia, that are yet to change their position at the World Trade Organisation should also do so with the hope of delivering a fast resolution. The IP waiver would allow developing countries to manufacture or import generic vaccine doses without the permission of the patent-holding firms. When it comes to patents, and other IP, the goal is always to balance the benefit of providing an incentive for innovation against the cost of restricting access to new ideas and technologies — in this case lifesaving vaccines. Vaccine nationalism and commercial incentives threaten to leave developing countries stuck at the back of the queue even longer, increasing the risk of more dangerous variants emerging in a vicious cycle. However, proponents of the waiver say the existing WTO flexibilities are too cumbersome and inefficient, hence the need for a general waiver to cut through.

An accurate view of the value under patent also matters. The vaccines in question were developed by private companies, but with billions of dollars in direct public funding and other government support. In addition to rewarding private risk-taking, the patents therefore also privatise the gains from significant public risk-taking. In any case, temporarily waiving vaccine IP would hardly destroy the incentive to innovate. The waiver is only being sought in the context of a once-in-a-century global pandemic.

History suggests there are plenty of powerful forces to prevent that from happening, and US Trade Representative Katherine Tai herself has made it pretty clear that this is not the direction in which things are headed. More fundamentally, the originator vaccine companies should still make plenty of profit, as long as rich countries agree not to use any new generic vaccines themselves — as is the case with the existing WTO flexibilities. Pharmaceutical companies already plan to hike vaccine prices once the acute part of the crisis is over.

To the extent developing countries were able to access cheaper generics, the originator firms would presumably then aim to extract even higher prices from rich countries. Whatever one might think of that, innovation incentives would thus be little changed. How effective the waiver will be in lifting global vaccine production is another matter. There are reasons for scepticism. First, key vaccine inputs are in short supply — from vital biomedical ingredients to bioreactor bags.

This appears to be the key immediate constraint and will need to be overcome for any ramp-up in global supply to happen. Second, vaccine production is more technically complex, compared to the making of many other medicines. Waiving patents would not unlock all the knowledge required, especially for the new mRNA vaccines. Tech transfer is therefore crucial but requires the participation of the originator firms — and they are already busy. Finally, there might simply not be a lot of additional vaccine production capacity out there. Prior to the pandemic, global vaccine capacity was put at 3. In April—June last year, the Coalition for Epidemic Preparedness Innovations CEPI surveyed vaccine manufacturers globally and identified the potential for between 2—4 billion doses in additional capacity to be brought online without jeopardising the production of other vaccines. Since then, companies producing Covid vaccines have announced total capacity plans amounting to between 11—13 billion doses in and 19 billion in That suggests that much of the potential capacity identified by CEPI a year ago is probably already in the process of being tapped.

Waiving vaccine IP would nonetheless probably deliver at least some increase in vaccine production, especially over time and by pushing originator firms to sign more licensing agreements. Any additional global supply would be extremely valuable. Despite the big target figures, vaccine production had only reached 1. Moreover, new and more dangerous variants will likely continue to surface — reducing vaccine efficacy, requiring more doses to reach herd immunity, and potentially rendering large portions of global vaccine supply ineffective. Booster shots might also be required to maintain immunity. Vaccine needs in rich countries would then persist, with vaccine nationalism and commercial incentives threatening to leave developing countries stuck at the back of the queue even longer, increasing the risk of more dangerous variants emerging in a vicious cycle.

Overcoming the shortage of input supplies is clearly critical. Calls to remove export restrictions and ramp up government investment to increase supply make sense. More money to help developing countries purchase enough vaccines is also critical. But it drives home the key point that, right now, timing is more important than money. Developing countries need far greater access to already available as well as near-term vaccine supplies. Rich countries — including the US and Australia — have begun sharing more vaccine doses. US President Joe Biden has said he wants to use the upcoming G7 summit in June to push forward a multilateral plan to vaccinate the world. Australia will also be at the meeting. With hope, it will deliver the necessary ambition. Main image via Flickr user throgers.

The trigger I envisioned for such a break would be a debate about population, with one of our major parties defecting from the long-standing bipartisan consensus on high immigration levels. They would say that Australia was full and that immigration must stop. If Australians supported such a policy, I argued, we would effectively be pulling up the drawbridge, signalling that our multicultural experiment had gone far enough and announcing that our long-term trajectory towards integration with Asia had been a mistake.

I never anticipated, of course, that immigration would grind to a halt as a result of a pandemic. In fact, I never made a prediction at all. I referred to this Australian Brexit as a worst-case scenario, a policy shock that seemed unlikely but which had become more plausible in the wake of Brexit and Donald Trump, and the rise of the populist right in Europe, all of which had been considered unthinkable by countless experts. Still, is my worst-case scenario now coming true? Do I feel vindicated? Not really. Or at least, not yet. Our Brexit moment has not yet arrived, but we are still on a path to a political future with much more scope for policy shocks of that kind. Similarly, the British public was pretty indifferent to Europe and the European Union — it was politicians who brought about Brexit.

An Australian halt to immigration, if it ever happens, would also be driven by politicians. I see this poll result as a temporary artefact of the pandemic, not the permanent or natural state of Australian public opinion. And when our government eventually moves to reopen the borders Treasurer Josh Frydenberg says migration will return to pre-Covid levels when safe to do so , I predict public opinion will follow. Skip carousel. Carousel Previous. Carousel Next. What is Scribd? Cancel anytime. Unavailable in your country. Continue browsing Preview unavailable. Publisher: HarperCollins. Released: Dec 23, ISBN: Format: Book. About the author DS.

Red Harvest Moon by Eva L. Related Podcast Episodes. Just Settle In: While canning tomatoes from a bumper crop, Jesse realized the process was going to take a loooooong time. His wife advised him, simply, to "just settle in. Episode New Potatoes: New potatoes are potatoes that are harvested young, or before the potato plant dies back and the potatoes fully mature. They have a thin, tender skin, are generally sweeter than mature potatoes, and are particularly delicious when pulled fresh from The Royal Eggplant Episode: This fruit is used as a vegetable and was once believed to cause insanity. Anney and Lauren dig into the odd history and science of the eggplant. The corn harvest is almost average, but in Iowa, Kansas Missouri, North Dakota and South Dakota farmers are lagging behind the average b Then Andrea tells the story of her Anney and Lauren peel back layers of the long history and smelly science of onions.

Infinite Sweet Potatoes From Slips? Let's get into it! In this part, Dan talks about the basics of vegetable seed production and Or brussels sprouts, carrots, cucumbers or even tomatoes? Maybe you haven't even thought about it - but today you're going to learn why. It's a big topic, food addictions, and one that needs some Find photos, links to Emma's work, and more in the show notes for this Save Microgreen Soil After Harvesting? It's a great question, and there isn't one answer, so listen in! One key piece of the agtech conversation that often gets overlooked is the most likely customer for a lot of digital tools may not actually be a farmer. For many of them, an advisor to that farmer may be the You may have already listened to the first part with Dr.

Terry Griffin at Kansas State University. Now we turn our attention to another Purdue

The Curse of the Were-Rabbit (Western Animation) - TV Tropes

Their with. If variety is the spice of life, then beetroot is among the spiciest! The range of varieties is reason enough to make space for it in the veggie garden. For the f. Onion prices drop in the peak production season and rise in the out-of-season period, when the market is dealing with stored onions or those produced in risky conditions.

Cape onions are harvested in mid- to late summer; the type grown is usually hig. All photography Alamy, unless otherwise credi. Open navigation menu. Close suggestions Search Search. User Settings. Skip carousel. Carousel Previous. Carousel Next. What is Scribd? Cancel anytime. Unavailable in your country. Continue browsing Preview unavailable. Publisher: HarperCollins. Released: Dec 23, ISBN: Format: Book.

About the author DS. Red Harvest Moon by Eva L. Related Podcast Episodes. Just Settle In: While canning tomatoes from a bumper crop, Jesse realized the process was going to take a loooooong time. His wife advised him, simply, to "just settle in. Episode New Potatoes: New potatoes are potatoes that are harvested young, or before the potato plant dies back and the potatoes fully mature. They have a thin, tender skin, are generally sweeter than mature potatoes, and are particularly delicious when pulled fresh from The Royal Eggplant Episode: This fruit is used as a vegetable and was once believed to cause insanity. Anney and Lauren dig into the odd history and science of the eggplant. The corn harvest is almost average, but in Iowa, Kansas Missouri, North Dakota and South Dakota farmers are lagging behind the average b Then Andrea tells the story of her Anney and Lauren peel back layers of the long history and smelly science of onions.

Infinite Sweet Potatoes From Slips? Let's get into it! In this part, Dan talks about the basics of vegetable seed production and Or brussels sprouts, carrots, cucumbers or even tomatoes? Reverend Hedges : To kill such a beast would require nerves of steel and Dramatic Pause a bullet. Thunderclap Lord Victor : A bullet? Thunder Reverend Hedges : A bullet! Thunder Lord Victor : A bu— Thunder plays again; Victor slams the shutters of a nearby window shut, annoyed What kind of bullet? Victor Quartermaine : on the were-rabbit, noticing the huge rabbit-shaped hole in the church window It's a big fellow, perhaps A matter easily dealt with by a hunter. Victor : I know your little secret, Pesto! I know exactly what's going on! Victor : Oh, yes. You think you can pilfer my filly, don't you? You think you can con an innocent woman out of her fortune!?!? Victor : Well, I got here first!

I've spent a lot of time reeling in that fluffy-headed bunny-lover, and I'm not about to let some puddle-headed peasant poach her from me! Wallace : Ohhh dear. Lord Victor Quartermaine : How on earth would those tiny-minded buffoons ever catch such a big rabbit? Wallace : Um Hurrahs from everybody else. Lord Victor : A bullet? It is mandatory to know the wattage of the device in order to choose the appropriate power converter. Recommended power converters Buy Now. No question and answer found. Customer Ratings. Review this product Share your thoughts with other customers Write a customer review. Customer Reviews. No customer reviews found. Write Your Own Reviews Only registered users can write reviews. Are you sure? Yes No.

An Honest Review of Misfits Market - Delishably

Victor : I know your little secret, Pesto! I know exactly what's going on! Victor : Oh, yes. You think you can pilfer my filly, don't you? You think you can con an innocent woman out of her fortune!?!? Victor : Well, I got here first! I've spent a lot of time reeling in that fluffy-headed bunny-lover, and I'm not about to let some puddle-headed peasant poach her from me! Wallace : Ohhh dear. Lord Victor Quartermaine : How on earth would those tiny-minded buffoons ever catch such a big rabbit? Wallace : Um Hurrahs from everybody else. Lord Victor : A bullet? Reverend Hedges : A bullet! Lord Victor : A bu—? Lady Tottington: No, Victor! The hunt is off! We made a terrible mistake! Victor Quartermaine: Oh, no, you commissioned me to rid you of Pesto , and that's just what I intend to do! Why, you Silphium appears in Pausanias' Description of Greece in a story of the Dioscuri staying at a house belonging to Phormion, a Spartan , "For it so happened that his maiden daughter was living in it.

By the next day this maiden and all her girlish apparel had disappeared, and in the room were found images of the Dioscuri, a table, and silphium upon it. In the Italian military heraldry , Il silfio d'oro reciso di Cirenaica "Silphium of Cyrenaica, smoothly cut and printed in gold; in blazon : silphium coupé or of Cyrenaica " is the symbol granted to units that distinguished themselves in the Western Desert Campaign in North Africa during World War II. Italian coat of arms Il silfio d'oro reciso di Cirenaica. Silphium depicted on the arms of Italian Libya. From Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia. Extinct plant used as a seasoning and medicine. This article is about the plant that was used in classical antiquity.

For the modern genus of plants, see Silphium genus. Not to be confused with Silpium. Main article: Heart symbol. October Worth American Scientist. Bibcode : AmSci.. JSTOR Michael Modern Antiquarian. Retrieved 13 Feb Journal des Savants in French. S2CID Conservation Biology. Only 1 bad item in 5 weeks. Why would our experiences with Misfits Market differ so greatly? You seem to be having a very different experience than I had. Many other people have commented that service is being delayed and produce is even worse than it was before. I hope it stays good for you! Question: I've recently had the same issues with Misfits market and I am beyond the point of frustration with them. The customer service is as horrible as the produce. Any idea if there is an actual phone number to call these people since they do not respond to email?

Question: Do you know that squash is not a root vegetable? Using those photos as examples of root vegetables grown in Mexico is a bit misleading, don't you think? Nearly all of the produce in every box I received was from Mexico, even though they claimed to source produce from local and regional farms. Question: My boxes have been full of rotten produce with ice packs warm. Now wondering if they were ever frozen. I have nothing good to say about this company. I live near the company and my boxes come rotten not ugly rotten!!! But yet people in Connecticut are claiming theirs are perfect?? Why is that?

Answer: It seems like more people have negative experiences than positive ones. It makes me wonder about the people who claim to receive perfect boxes weekly. Answer: I have no idea! They are the only service that delivers in my area though. Some people have good experiences though, just not me. Question: My experience in CT has been wonderful Perhaps it is your delivery service?

Answer: I doubt the delivery service was involved in sourcing, selecting, and packaging poor quality, damaged, and rotting produce. Why continue with a failed business? The first one was okay, as it had a deliciously ripe mango inside Thanks for your honest opinion. And the pics! That definitely sounds like a Misfits Market box! I'm sorry you had the same experience as so many of us. My box was terrible too. I loved the idea, but it's not working here. Josh - that definitely doesn't sound like a good experience at all! And who would ever go through 2 pounds of ginger in a week? I'm glad that you cut your losses quickly though. I really wish that I had read this prior to starting my subscription service.

I live in a suburb of Philadelphia and in the "Best of Philly" edition of Philadelphia magazine they did a small piece on Misfits Market. We have a one year old so I wanted to give it a shot for some variety to feed him. The first box came taped up with packing tape and smashed. Surprisingly only a small squash was broken although it did come with two pounds of ginger. The second box arrived smashed as well but everything in it seemed okay. There were four peaches that looked great the afternoon they arrived, but by the next morning they were all moldy.

The third and final box arrived yesterday with the same packing tape holding it together because it looked like it was driven over by a truck. The same exact produce from the second box except for somebody from the first box decided to come along I received another two pounds of ginger. Since I still have 1. Joe - that sounds like a horrible experience! I have to agree about so much of this. I have to throw away so much of the produce. Leah is right their customer service is horrible. One of my boxes was destroyed to the point they couldn't deliver it and it took almost 3 weeks for Misfits to answer my emails, I did get a full refund but it was so much work.

This week FedEx deliver my box to the wrong address and the person who received it didn't do anything until Saturday, so it sat outside for a day and half needless to say I had to throw most of it away. I will be canceling my subscription. It's not worth all the hassle. Fortunately, my local supermarket also has a section for local growers also! I had the exact same experience as you. Rotting produce from Mexico shipped in extraordinary amounts of packaging, thrown on my door step by FedEx or other various courier services. I cancelled it pretty quickly. Trying to support local farmers! I tried Misfit Market a year ago and was very happy with the boxes received. They came on time and there was the occasional short lived item. I stopped the service because I was receiving collard greens and kale in each box.

More that my husband and I could eat. And unfortunately, these were items I couldn't give away because no one wanted them. I renewed by subscription in March and did not get my first box until 5 weeks later in April. This box had some short lived items but I was happy for the produce. After that everything went downhill. I was being charged for a delivery on Sunday and receiving the box until Tuesday or Wednesday of the following week. The fruit was almost inedible and I received more kale that anyone could unless you ate it everyday. There was one box that was never delivered and I was almost accused of being a liar until Fedex finally verified that it was not delivered because they thought it was spoiled.

I received a replacement box the day before my regular delivery I was able to get a box worth of items between the two. I added to an order and never received the additions but was charged for them. The last box I received before canceling the subscription had more spoiled items than good items. As soon as the box was opened the spoiled items made you sick to the stomach with the stench. I threw the whole box away because even the unspoiled items had slime on them. I took pictures of everything and sent them in an email, as you are directed to do. After 10 days of no response from them, I received an email telling me that I probably had received my response and if not this message had timed out and if I still had a complaint I had to resubmit the message.

Ugly is one thing but spoiled is an entirely different scenario. I wish I lived by some of these people who have had no issues because I would continue to use them. I live in Philadelphia, my distribution center is about 25 minutes from house in Pennsauken, NJ. My packages take days to get to my house sometimes. All I can say is Buyer Beware. It's definitely a great concept, but it just didn't carry over in practice. Unfortunately it seems like they've also gotten worse over time, especially with the complaint options limited to quality issues! I wish I lived closer to farms so that I could support them! I'm glad that you only ordered one box and found a better solution to get produce. I tried out this box a year ago or so because my friend recommended it to me. The apples were old and cereal textured. They were bruised up and just tasted bad. In that same box the bell peppers they gave me were moldy on the inside. I asked my friend if she ever had this happen to her and she said no.

I think they just send out bad produce sometimes that is not just ugly but actually old and moldy. I got a refund and didn't order from misfit market again. It's sad because I would like to buy the ugly produce. I just go to farms around the state now to get my produce and help the farmers in another way. My experience with Misfits was also pretty bad. Produce arrived on Friday at ; by Tuesday at noon a lot was already rotten or sprouting. Very disappointing because it is a great concept. It seems like the boxes are very hit or miss. People eat they get boxes full of usable produce or rotting trash. But across the board, the customer service is terrible.

I'll add my 2 cents. I've had no problem at all with quality and frankly don't care if the box is delivered 1 or 2 days late. But, a couple of weeks ago, I responded to one of their "Extras" emails, and asked that a container of blackberries be added to my order. They have a form on their website to fill out for problems. I've done so twice, with no response! Plus, thanks for info on the Mexican produce angle, didn't notice that Yana - hopefully you can get your money back and avoid having to throw any more money in the trash.

I wish I read your review prior to ordering their boxes. What a scam! Each box was filled with spaghetti squash from Mexico just like the one in your picture. Who knows how old this spaghetti squash is. Berries rotten, onions rotten, apples bruised. I just cancelled my subscription and didn't realize they already charged me for the upcoming shipment. Will try to dispute this charge. I really really wanted to like this, ordered the biggest box they offered. I received it today. I should had read the reviews before purchasing. Received broken produce, terrible apples with brown everywhere, half carrots and the list goes on Thank you! I hope you have an easy time getting your money refunded! I am canceling my subscription, and if they don't refund me for the rotted produce and missing items from this week- I'll be disputing the charge with my bank.

Nice concept but they have no care about the produce freshness, variety or being timely or communicative. Experiences like ours seem to be far too common - amazing boxes at first, and then a dramatic decline in quality AND service. It's a shame because it could have been such a good idea. I was very happy with Misfits for the first few weeks. I even excitedly sent pictures of the beautiful colorful contents of each box to my 4 sisters encouraging them to sign up. WOW, what a difference a few weeks can make. I have received completely unacceptable produce for the past three weeks. The first week I gave them the benefit of the doubt because of past good experiences. However, now it has been three weeks of garbage There is no phone number, which I think is a little bit sketchy. You have to message them and hope for the best.

Too bad, it sounded like a good way to support American farmers and avoid food waste. Not exactly avoiding waste if I have to throw it out when it gets here. Also, not supporting our farmers if it comes from Central America, not the United States! I had the same experience, I feel as if I paid to have their garbage shipped to me to throw away and after a week still no word from customer service. Patricia - I wish I had thought to weigh my boxes! Leah - I wish I had seen your review earlier - I too was excited about helping out the local farmers and getting organic produce, which I buy anyway, for a reduced price.

I ordered the smaller box as a test and I am so unhappy it is ridiculous. My total weight was Their cover page leads you to believe that they are working with U. I have a group of us that are trying to buy and support American businesses and this was the test box -- needless to say - we will not be buying from them again. Best is, I'm in Florida and they shipped from NJ - with all the farms down here, thought I'd at least get something closer. Ruth - your experience was the complete opposite of mine.

Vegetable Puns – Pimpedia

You need to login to do this. Get Known if you don't have an account. Victor Quartermaine : [whispering] Listen, I don't want to cause any panic , but the beast isn't actually dead yet. Stunned Silence ; Victor does a facepalm. Constable : [through the megaphone] Oops. Just a bit of harmless brain alteration, that's all! Reverend Hedges : To kill such a beast would require nerves of steel and Dramatic Pause a bullet. Thunderclap Lord Victor : A bullet? Thunder Reverend Hedges : A bullet! Thunder Lord Victor : A bu— Thunder plays again; Victor slams the shutters of a nearby window shut, annoyed What kind of bullet?

Victor Quartermaine : on the were-rabbit, noticing the huge rabbit-shaped hole in the church window It's a big fellow, perhaps A matter easily dealt with by a hunter. Victor : I know your little secret, Pesto! I know exactly what's going on! Victor : Oh, yes. You think you can pilfer my filly, don't you? You think you can con an innocent woman out of her fortune!?!? Victor : Well, I got here first! I've spent a lot of time reeling in that fluffy-headed bunny-lover, and I'm not about to let some puddle-headed peasant poach her from me! Wallace : Ohhh dear. Lord Victor Quartermaine : How on earth would those tiny-minded buffoons ever catch such a big rabbit? Wallace : Um Hurrahs from everybody else. Lord Victor : A bullet? Reverend Hedges : A bullet! Lord Victor : A bu—? Lady Tottington: No, Victor! Joe - that sounds like a horrible experience! I have to agree about so much of this.

I have to throw away so much of the produce. Leah is right their customer service is horrible. One of my boxes was destroyed to the point they couldn't deliver it and it took almost 3 weeks for Misfits to answer my emails, I did get a full refund but it was so much work. This week FedEx deliver my box to the wrong address and the person who received it didn't do anything until Saturday, so it sat outside for a day and half needless to say I had to throw most of it away. I will be canceling my subscription. It's not worth all the hassle. Fortunately, my local supermarket also has a section for local growers also!

I had the exact same experience as you. Rotting produce from Mexico shipped in extraordinary amounts of packaging, thrown on my door step by FedEx or other various courier services. I cancelled it pretty quickly. Trying to support local farmers! I tried Misfit Market a year ago and was very happy with the boxes received. They came on time and there was the occasional short lived item I stopped the service because I was receiving collard greens and kale in each box. More that my husband and I could eat. And unfortunately, these were items I couldn't give away because no one wanted them. I renewed by subscription in March and did not get my first box until 5 weeks later in April.

This box had some short lived items but I was happy for the produce. After that everything went downhill. I was being charged for a delivery on Sunday and receiving the box until Tuesday or Wednesday of the following week. The fruit was almost inedible and I received more kale that anyone could unless you ate it everyday. There was one box that was never delivered and I was almost accused of being a liar until Fedex finally verified that it was not delivered because they thought it was spoiled. I received a replacement box the day before my regular delivery I was able to get a box worth of items between the two. I added to an order and never received the additions but was charged for them. The last box I received before canceling the subscription had more spoiled items than good items.

As soon as the box was opened the spoiled items made you sick to the stomach with the stench. I threw the whole box away because even the unspoiled items had slime on them. I took pictures of everything and sent them in an email, as you are directed to do. After 10 days of no response from them, I received an email telling me that I probably had received my response and if not this message had timed out and if I still had a complaint I had to resubmit the message. Ugly is one thing but spoiled is an entirely different scenario. I wish I lived by some of these people who have had no issues because I would continue to use them. I live in Philadelphia, my distribution center is about 25 minutes from house in Pennsauken, NJ. My packages take days to get to my house sometimes. All I can say is Buyer Beware. It's definitely a great concept, but it just didn't carry over in practice. Unfortunately it seems like they've also gotten worse over time, especially with the complaint options limited to quality issues!

I wish I lived closer to farms so that I could support them! I'm glad that you only ordered one box and found a better solution to get produce. I tried out this box a year ago or so because my friend recommended it to me. The apples were old and cereal textured. They were bruised up and just tasted bad. In that same box the bell peppers they gave me were moldy on the inside. I asked my friend if she ever had this happen to her and she said no. I think they just send out bad produce sometimes that is not just ugly but actually old and moldy. I got a refund and didn't order from misfit market again.

It's sad because I would like to buy the ugly produce. I just go to farms around the state now to get my produce and help the farmers in another way. My experience with Misfits was also pretty bad. Produce arrived on Friday at ; by Tuesday at noon a lot was already rotten or sprouting. Very disappointing because it is a great concept. It seems like the boxes are very hit or miss. People eat they get boxes full of usable produce or rotting trash. But across the board, the customer service is terrible. I'll add my 2 cents. I've had no problem at all with quality and frankly don't care if the box is delivered 1 or 2 days late.

But, a couple of weeks ago, I responded to one of their "Extras" emails, and asked that a container of blackberries be added to my order. They have a form on their website to fill out for problems. I've done so twice, with no response! Plus, thanks for info on the Mexican produce angle, didn't notice that Yana - hopefully you can get your money back and avoid having to throw any more money in the trash. I wish I read your review prior to ordering their boxes. What a scam! Each box was filled with spaghetti squash from Mexico just like the one in your picture. Who knows how old this spaghetti squash is. Berries rotten, onions rotten, apples bruised. I just cancelled my subscription and didn't realize they already charged me for the upcoming shipment.

Will try to dispute this charge. I really really wanted to like this, ordered the biggest box they offered. I received it today. I should had read the reviews before purchasing. Received broken produce, terrible apples with brown everywhere, half carrots and the list goes on Thank you! I hope you have an easy time getting your money refunded! I am canceling my subscription, and if they don't refund me for the rotted produce and missing items from this week- I'll be disputing the charge with my bank. Nice concept but they have no care about the produce freshness, variety or being timely or communicative. Experiences like ours seem to be far too common - amazing boxes at first, and then a dramatic decline in quality AND service.

It's a shame because it could have been such a good idea. I was very happy with Misfits for the first few weeks. I even excitedly sent pictures of the beautiful colorful contents of each box to my 4 sisters encouraging them to sign up. WOW, what a difference a few weeks can make. I have received completely unacceptable produce for the past three weeks. The first week I gave them the benefit of the doubt because of past good experiences. However, now it has been three weeks of garbage There is no phone number, which I think is a little bit sketchy.

You have to message them and hope for the best. Too bad, it sounded like a good way to support American farmers and avoid food waste. Not exactly avoiding waste if I have to throw it out when it gets here. Also, not supporting our farmers if it comes from Central America, not the United States! I had the same experience, I feel as if I paid to have their garbage shipped to me to throw away and after a week still no word from customer service. Patricia - I wish I had thought to weigh my boxes! Leah - I wish I had seen your review earlier - I too was excited about helping out the local farmers and getting organic produce, which I buy anyway, for a reduced price.

I ordered the smaller box as a test and I am so unhappy it is ridiculous. My total weight was Their cover page leads you to believe that they are working with U. I have a group of us that are trying to buy and support American businesses and this was the test box -- needless to say - we will not be buying from them again. Best is, I'm in Florida and they shipped from NJ - with all the farms down here, thought I'd at least get something closer.

Ruth - your experience was the complete opposite of mine. Even though I had a specific produce item listed as an allergy, it would be included in every single box, and would often be the only item that wasn't rotten. I didn't see the value in paying for a box of produce and having to give away the only item that was actually usable, and being told to see that as "saving money. I wanted to like Misfits. The first few boxes after I signed up in Feb were decent.

Especially given the pandemic. Even if a few things were rotten I let it go. Even if the box was a couple days late, it's okay. But for the last 3 weeks in a row, they sent 10 lb, 11 lb and 12 lb boxes respectively for the "madness" size which is suppose to be a minimum of 18 lbs. Plus out of the lbs received at least 2 lbs were truly rotten and not usable. Then the remaining 10 lbs is just about to rot. I emailed them as there is no phone number and hadn't heard back from them at all for 2 weeks. Posted on their Facebook community page asking for a response and all they do is now delete any post that reflects negatively on their company. Finally decided to file a dispute with my credit card company and bam. Most of the weight is from butternut squash acorn squash and potatoes. It's great that some people have good experiences, but it's true that not everyone has great experiences.

The people having good experiences can't believe and almost think we people who have had experiences are lying. Like why would we be lying? If Misfits worked out that would've saved me time, money and protected my family. Trust me, I wanted it so badly to work out. It's a shame. My boxes are worth the price -or more - consistently. Thank you. You should at least be able to dispute the charge with your credit card company. It sounds like all the issues they already had just got worse with the pandemic. I have been waiting over a month for my first box which was due to arrive today. I have been charged for not only that box but also the second box. Their customer service is nonexistent. If you try to email them they send you back an automated response with no help for your problem. Waiting a month and getting charged for 2 boxes before getting anything sent is ridiculous.

I was charged right away for my weekly shipment, but then advised that I would not receive my first delivery before the end of April. I then patiently waited for my first delivery, all the while I was continuously pitched to buy into additional services. Meanwhile, I will be charged for my second shipment. To sum it up: this company does not have its act together, or is a fraud. In any case, it would have taken 3 days for my order to be delivered and I'm not sure in what state my greens would have arrived? Not sure what to think, but I would not recommend this service and will cancel my account and ask for a full refund. I had some broken zucchini and busted bell peppers, but I blamed the delivery. But lately they are having serious issues with delivery - just check what people are saying on twitter. With everything going on I understand some sort of delay by a few days but I am about to get billed 3rd time and the billed first box in question still in processing, getting run around.

I just got my first box today and I experienced everything you said above! I thought maybe with everything going on right now that is the reason this box looked like that. I emailed them over 2 weeks ago and still no response. Appears no one can ever get in contact with customer service. This will be my first and last box sadly. My first 2 boxes were just OK. I thought I would upgrade to the larger lb box. Well, 2 days late, warm, banged up and broken, worm holes, cabbage browning veggies. Oh, my box weighed in, at just 14lbs. This is not acceptable. They threw in 2 bunches of kale on top for filler. I have tried the customer service 3 time. I just get a standardized letter. I've sent pictures of the produce. Well, I am giving them 24 hours to respond. I'm being generous. Buyer beware!! Sorry to say but.. I cannot recommend MM market. They would not be lying, as the produce probably originally came from farms, weather locally or "across the Americas" Just a guess. Good luck! Thanks for the info, they are the only ones available in my area, so going to give them a try anyway.

Maybe they have improved. One thing to note, their sourcing says they gather from farms and partners Technically speaking, Mexico is part of the Americas. So not entirely a lie but perhaps a bit misleading. Wish me luck :. I thought I was the only one It is hard to photograph how bad it was, but there was actual mold growing on half the produce I complained, and the second box was worse too - I also had carrots you could tie in knots and dissolving onions.

I think I may have gotten the same batch of shishitos too, haha. Sorry you had this experience. I'm looking at trying Imperfect Foods this week to see if it's any better. I was about to sign up for misfit market. While online i stumbled on your site and thank goodness i did. You had a great review. After seeing your review misfit is out the door. Ill go back to the farmers market where i can see what I'm getting before I pay for it. So I got my 1st box very excited! Few onions snd carrots few apples wich I am not sure are even organic and this was the big box?

I hope it stays that good for you! Mine was that it got progressively worse until the entire box was unusable at the end, although initially only a few items were that way. We get a great variety of fruits and veggies. Sorry you had a bad experience. My husband and I really enjoy it. It seems like their service is just as rotten as their produce was for me. I've been receiving Misfits boxes from the beginning and have had great boxes of veggies.

When I reported the occasional problem their customer service team was so accommodating. I live in New England and come from an organic agricultural background and understand produce. This is a true conundrum. At the time, I was using it for people and still couldn't use it, so don't feel too bad! It's kind of sad that a service that aims to reduce food waste just ends up creating waste. I'm not a huge fan of dill, but FYI - you can always freeze it. My mom always does that to use in chicken soup, but a little goes a long way. I tried Misfits for a month and had just unsubscribe from it today. I was unable to pick what I wanted in my box and ended up wasting so much food. They also expired so quick so it wasn't a good fit for a single person. The box was also filled up with things that weighs a lot but can't eat like dill.

Who would eat that much of dill? They were clearly added just so that the box would weigh more. I'm pretty disappointed. I completely agree with this. My first box was wonderful; the produce was delicious, and an amazing variety. I am on my 4th, and last box and the quality of the produce just keeps getting less and less. Yesterday, when my box arrived there were three bunches of lettuce that were completely unusable, both carrots had to be thrown away because they were already mushy, and the majority of usable produce was several stalks of celery. I love the concept of Misfits, and I could care less what the produce looks like, weird shapes, various sizes, etc I'm done with Misfits. Shanada - I absolutely agree with you. I loved the idea, but it falls way short in practice. They should have been able to plan properly and provide the service and products they charge us for! I had so many issues with the boxes every single week, and they refused to refund my money. Just a couple of weeks ago, they actually tried to woo me back!

Backstory one me. I was a classically trained chef now I am a SAHM so the moment the box is delivered it in the house being unpacked. I meal plan our dinners and I thought it might be fun to have a "mystery box" of vegetable sides or even main dishes thrown into our menu. We also canceled our Misfits Market, today actually, after receiving two large boxes. The first box had split bell peppers a rotten cucumber, green chard that I had to cook practically the moment it came out of the box and 5 turnips that we all terribly bitter.

I roasted one, pickled two and made turnip soup with the remaining two, all came out awful and was ultimately a waste of time, energy and money. The second box came with bruised pears, a brown green apple a rotted sweet potato and wilted lettuce at least it did not have turnips! I get that they are a growing company and need to work out the kinks of the business but they are doing it using our hard earned money.

I don't see this being around very long. It was definitely a miss for me. I've been using Misfits Market for months now and I have been very happy with them.

The Lady in the Tower: The Fall of Anne Boleyn \(Queen of England Series\) free ebook

Coaching People : Expert Solutions to Everyday Challenges download ebook

A Tramp Abroad download pdf, epub

Faroe Island Knits : Over 50 Traditional Motifs and 25 Projects from the North Atlantic free book

Why Should Anyone Be Led by You? : What It Takes to Be an Authentic Leader free book

Revenge at Bella Terra free book

Say it with a Stitch : Mix and match 10 projects with over 45 sentiments and designs to create irres free pdf

Mr Churchills Secretary download pdf, epub